New 20 Pins Now In Effect

The new VBA 20 pins were accepted and became effective 1 July. The price for pin and first distance bar is $2.00. Additional distance bars is $.75. The cost of these awards to be borne by the Host Club. Club secretaries will receive applications from the Corresponding Secretary. These applications are to be sent to the Field Vice President. The awards will be mailed directly to the archer.

The Corresponding Secretary and Field Vice President reported that Club secretaries were using nick-names on classification cards and on VBA forms which is creating a problem trying to figure out if names like Sonny Limerick is the same person as E. Eugene Limerick who is on the VBA file. If this situation is cleared up it will expedite the sending out of awards and other records and forms.

How Lucky Can A Guy Be ? ?

Claude Bartley of Sherwood Archers, Roanoke, won the Apache Camp Trailer given away at the National Field Archery Tournament. The NFAA decided to give the Trailer free to the average archer attending the shoot by taking the top score and the low score of the tournament, adding the two together and dividing by two. Claude's score tied with two others. They then had to draw from the hat. Congratulations Claude!

Recommended Safety Rules For VBA

1. Never aim an arrow at another person. It's no joke if you slip.
2. Never walk up to a target while others are still shooting—and conversely, never shoot at a target while another is near it.
3. Never shoot an arrow up into the air. It can come down on someone's head.
4. When hunting, never climb up or down a hill holding an arrow nocked in your bow. It's easy to fall on your own arrow.
5. Never use your bow hand as an arrow rest. It can be cut by sharp feathers and pierced with small (or large) splinters.
6. Before drawing a bead on your hunting target, make sure it's an animal and not another hunter.

7. Never shoot a split or cracked arrow. It may break and drive through your bow hand.
8. Never shoot an arrow shorter than your draw length. You might overdraw it and stab it into your bow hand.
9. If a feather comes loose at its leading edge, don't use the arrow until it's been cemented down properly.
10. Don't shoot arrows with self nocks (nocks that are cut into the shaft without reinforcement).
11. When bracing a bow, observe all the safety precautions.
12. Make sure your arrow is properly nocked on the string before releasing.
13. Don't stand forward of an archer, even though off to one side. You might become the bystander-victim of a poorly nocked arrow.
14. Don't use a weak-spined arrow on a heavy bow. It may break and drive through your bow hand.
15. If while drawing the arrow slips off the arrow rest, don't try to replace it on the rest while at full draw. The chance of accidentally releasing it and shooting it through your hand or a bystander are too great. Instead, relax the bow and start the draw from scratch.

areas reserved at all times for still hunting only.

A man in Southwest Virginia was acquitted of driving while intoxicated when a doctor testified he "did not think he was drunk because his speech was not affected, his eyes were not glazed and that the pupils were not dilated." His test reading, some time after arrest, was .14. Many physicians feel an individual is incapable of driving safely when the concentration is .05 or less.

TO THE VICTOR

by
JIM LIVESAY

The air was charged with the peculiar tension which usually accompanies a great spectacle. Two combatants were about to engage in a to-the-death duel. It couldn't be otherwise, for each one was an instinctive enemy of the other. To top it off, one was trespassing on the territory of the other. The two were almost evenly matched in size, 30 inches in length for Fang as against 33 inches for Blackie. Where Fang possessed a powerful venom, Blackie was unbelievably quick and supple. Fang was stocky, Blackie lean and lithe. They were unequal equals, you might say.

Blackie had discovered a seemingly inexhaustible food supply in this territory. He had happened on this place by accident one day after he had been soundly whipped by a larger black snake who had moved in on him just after Blackie had made a meal of a lizard and was comfortably dozing on a large rock outside his den. Deciding discretion to be the better part of valor, he had declined further honors by running away. Blackie had noticed large pathways running this way and that in this new land. He was crossing and his attention was caught by field mice playing around a large bundle of straw. He lay quietly by, observing and waiting until he was hungry again. He then found it quite easy to pick off a meal at leisure. The straw was set up on an old tire and afforded an ideal den for Blackie. It is easy to set up housekeeping under such favorable conditions. In his forays to secure lizards, insects and other things of interest to black snakes, Blackie discovered other bundles of straw similarly situated on old tires. And more mice. This was too good to be true. It wouldn't be for long.

Old Fang had been moved from his usual haunts by an entirely different set of circumstances. The weather had turned dry. Not that rattlesnakes dislike dry weather. On the contrary. But, his prey, the many small animals and other creeping, flying things followed moisture like a magnet. Fang was hunting the lower part of the mountain when he encountered Blackie. Fang struck without warning, but Blackie turned aside in a flash. Fang re-coiled quickly and with an angry buzzing but Blackie had withdrawn to a safe distance in order to size up his opponent. Hate glimmered in the eyes of each and one thought dominated all others, "kill him first." Blackie kept himself stretched out with his body always in a line directly away from the buzzing coil that was Fang. Blackie's tail was vibrating against a dry leaf and was making a sound not too much different from the angry buzzing made by the rattles on Fang. This mockery infuriated Fang. Blackie raised his head and neck into an arch and moved slowly closer, weaving this way and that. Fang struck again and missed. Feint and thrust, dodge and parry. It was maddening, the way Fang just barely missed on each strike. In his rage, Fang failed to notice that Blackie had maneuvered until now each strike was made up-hill and where Fang was using up his energy in the futile lunges at his opponent, Blackie was coolly saving himself. It was a running fight but there were no cowards here. Only savage and calculating minds bent on the destruction of the hated rival. Fang was tiring. His strikes were getting shorter and it took more taunting and moving in closer to keep Fang's rage at white hot pitch. Blackie was careless in one feint and felt a searing pain on his neck where Fang's hypodermic grazed him. Learn and live. Still they fought and on new ground. Blackie was backed against a stump and his head was raised over a root which was round and soft from age. Fang struck and missed but for some reason sank his Fangs into the root. In a flash, Blackie was on him. Before Fang could coil, Blackie was rolling around him and tightening each coil. When Blackie had used his entire length to wrap Fang from head to belly, he suddenly straightened out. With a sound like thirty knuckles cracking, Fang was dis-jointed. It was the moment of truth for Fang. The triumphant black snake unrolled himself, reared up over his fallen enemy and then moved silently away about three yards where he turned to watch the wriggling mass of help-less flesh and bone. Exultant, weary Blackie crawled in his footless way into the path just in front of the bale and dozed off. Oblivious to the whine and thud of four shafts which found their mark in the target above him, Blackie slept a victor's sleep. The archer, approaching, drew back with an unvoiced—"Snake!!" Screaming in his throat. Quickly nocking, he sent a shaft straight into the sleeping brain of Blackie.

"Why?" You say. Well, friend, fear plays a supporting role, but mostly ignorance hogs the show. If you would help nature restore herself to glory, then learn all you can of her goodness and her badness and then think it over.
